Courses Taught at UMBC

PSYC 311: Research Methods in Psychology I. Evaluation and interpretation of psychological research: how and why psychologists conduct research, interpretation of basic descriptive and inferential statistics, use of the psychology literature and critical evaluation of published research, technical writing skills in psychology, and ethical and cultural considerations in psychological research.

PSYC 312: Research Methods in Psychology I. Design and analysis of psychological research, including single- and multi-factor experiments and quasi-experiments, and bivariate correlation. Students develop skills in data management, data manipulation, and data analysis using statistical software and develop a research proposal. Highly recommended for students interested in graduate study in Psychology and related disciplines.

PSYC 331: Experimental Psychology: Design and Analysis I. Design and analysis of single-variable experiments and quasi-experiments. This course emphasizes the design, analysis, interpretation and evaluation of psychological research.

PSYC 332: Experimental Psychology: Design and Analysis II. Design and analysis of experiments, including multi-factor problems. Students perform experiments, apply statistical methods in data analysis and write scientific reports.

PSYC 340: Social Psychology. Analysis of theories and research in the scientific study of human social phenomena, focusing on the relationship between the social environment and individual behavior.

PSYC 493: Seminar in Quantitative Methods: Multiple Regression. Application and use of multiple regression in Psychological research. Students receive extensive theoretical and applied training in the use and interpretation of multiple regression.

PSYC 603: Personal, Social, Community, and Cultural Bases of Behavior. Second of two core courses for doctoral students in psychology that addresses biopsychosocial bases of human behavior. Core II complements the basic foundational knowledge in the following core areas: neuroscience, behavior genetics, learning, cognitive function, lifespan development, and history and systems from Core I and offers foundational knowledge in the areas of Individual Differences and Personality, Social Influence and Social Cognition, Community and Cultural Dimensions of Human behavior, and Prevention and Policy interventions based on these perspectives. In addition, the course includes important historical readings as well as current views and controversies. Emphasis is on integration of material across domains

PSYC 611: Data Analytic Procedures I. The purpose of the course is to train students in the theory and uses of simple and complex analyses of variance and in the uses of multiple regression analyses as a hypothesis-testing procedure.

(Including associated lab – focusing on estimation of the analyses using two statistical software packages; SAS and SPSS)

PSYC 711: Data Analytic Procedures II. Applications of multivariate methods of data analysis in psychological research. Topics include multi-variate descriptive statistics, multi-variate multiple regression, multi-variate analysis of variance and covariance and factor analysis.

(Including associated lab – focusing on estimation of the analyses using two statistical software packages; SAS and SPSS)

PSYC 713: Longitudinal Data Analysis. The focus of this course is on the understanding and application of analytical techniques that are alternatives to the Repeated Measures ANOVA model when working with data arising from longitudinal designs; Latent Growth Curve modeling (LGC) and Individual Growth Curve analysis (IGC). This course focuses on the ability to distinguish and choose between the techniques, to understand strengths and weaknesses of the techniques, to critically read research using the techniques, and to apply both of these techniques to your own research.

PSYC 717: Structural Equation Modeling. This course will build upon students' knowledge of multivariate statistical analysis by introducing them to one of the newer multivariate techniques - structural equation modeling. This technique encompasses an entire family of methods known by many names. among them covariance structure analysis, latent variable analysis, confirmatory factor analysis, path analysis, and causal modeling. An understanding of structural equation modeling will be developed by relating it to students' previous knowledge of multiple linear regression and exploratory factor analysis, and expanding to allow for correlated and causally related latent constructs.
